

Bananas are cut down by hand. They are then brought to a shed, where workers wash and sort them. This uses as much as 100 times the weight of the fruit in water. Some bananas may be too large, too small, too curvy, or too straight and are thrown away. For every ton of bananas that get shipped, about two tons of wastes are left behind.

Washing/Sorting

Bananas are cut down by hand. They are then brought to a shed, where workers wash and sort them. This uses as much as 100 times the weight of the fruit in water. Some bananas may be too large, too small, too curvy, or too straight and are thrown away. For every ton of bananas that get shipped, about two tons of wastes are left behind.

Washing/Sorting

Bananas are cut down by hand. They are then brought to a shed, where workers wash and sort them. This uses as much as 100 times the weight of the fruit in water. Some bananas may be too large, too small, too curvy, or too straight and are thrown away. For every ton of bananas that get shipped, about two tons of wastes are left behind.

Washing/Sorting

Bananas are cut down by hand. They are then brought to a shed, where workers wash and sort them. This uses as much as 100 times the weight of the fruit in water. Some bananas may be too large, too small, too curvy, or too straight and are thrown away. For every ton of bananas that get shipped, about two tons of wastes are left behind.

Washing/Sorting

